Main forest road network

30. October 2025

The main forest road network refers to the fundamental development of a forest area through primary roads or forest roads that provide higher-level access. These roads are used for transporting timber with trucks or large forestry machines and form the backbone of the forest road system, to which the secondary access network (e.g., skid trails) is connected.